TOOTHPICKS AND ROMANCE

(By D. J. Walsh.)

PHYLLIS, brown-eyed and slender, had ideals, inherited from the romantic, semi-invalid mother who named her Phyllis May, but there was little time for the nursing of ideals in the Gregory household. Phyllis began work at fourteen, standing on her feet all day behind the counter in a 10-cent store and dragging her weary body to school three nights a week. By the time she was sixteen she had finished night school and mastered shorthand and typewriting. Now, at nineteen, she had secured her first stenographic position and was beginning to feel that her feet were firmly set on the first round of the ladder of success.

From her couch in the front room Mrs. Gregory nominally supervised the household. "Tim, you must wash your hands more carefully. They are positively grimy. And your nails—"

"Aw, for Pete's sake, mother," and the overgrown sixteen-year-old boy could look guiltily at the offending nails, then awkwardly pat his mother's thin shoulder. "What with you and Phil, I don't never get no peace!"

"And you studied grammar at school?" Phyllis would exclaim, disgustedly.

"Grammar don't mean anything," he retorted. "It's what you do, not what you say, that counts."

Phyllis had to admit that he was right fundamentally. "But still," she insisted, "being able to talk correctly indicates good breeding."

"Sure and I'm a well-bred plumber's assistant," he boasted, closing the argument.

Phyllis hated Tim's work. To her it was dirty in every sense of the word, but he had been forced to accept anything he could get. He speedily found something intriguing about bathroom fixtures, and boasted that one day he could be a millionaire plumber and live in a porcelain-lined home.

But with the entry of Curtis Ashe into Phyllis' life minor worries were forgotten. Young and good looking, with that well-groomed air that won't so admire, he seemed the materialization of all she had dreamed. Curtis was one of the richest customers of Harvie Bros., where she was employed. He came into the office occasionally to talk with Mr. Harvie, and after a few casual chats with Phyllis came oftener, invited her to lunch and even suggested dinner and theater.

Phyllis accepted the luncheon invitations and eventually the theater, but he declined to take dinner with him. "It's my only meal with mother," she explained, "and she looks forward to it."

"I should think your brother could entertain her for once," Curtis grumbled.

"I also prepare the dinner," she indignantly replied.

Curtis had smiled, she thought with a merry surprise. "I'd like to meet your mother," he said presently.

Phyllis felt herself flushing hotly. Mother would be delighted to have him take dinner with us one evening," she suggested, diffidently.

Curtis accepted with alacrity, and Phyllis did her best with the dinner. It was comfortable and tasty, if not expensively furnished. Her mother had a real Irish linen tablecloth, relic of better days, and the old mahogany sideboard, incongruously massive, gave dignity to the dining room. Tim consented, with some urging, to scrub his nails clean for once. But good-natured, well-meaning Tim must spoiled things in the end. The dinner, from roast chicken to homemade ice cream and caramel cake, had been perfect. Curtis had become genial and expansive, Phyllis was very happy. Before they left the table Tim looked around inquiringly, then rose and rammed through the kitchen closet. He came back with what he called "his forgot to put them on the table."

"No, no thank you," Curtis waved them away with a strained expression, and helped himself. "Take one, sis," he invited.

After her guest had gone Phyllis was way to angry tears. "He'll think me common and don't know any thing," she sobbed.

"If he really cares for you he won't care a little slip like that," Mrs. Gregory tried to comfort her. Tim, bringing at his carefully scrubbed nails, did nothing.

A month passed and Curtis showed unmistakably that a little matter of tootHPicks could not come between him and his love. She and tremulous Phyllis crept into her mother's arms and tell the wonderful news. "Curtis loves me. He wants to be married right away."

"You deserve the best," her romantic mother answered, satisfied. Then came plans for the wedding at afterwards. "We'll take a short trip," Curtis had said, pressing her cheek against his shoulder. "I'm bringing you the home you admired in New York."

"A real home, at last!" breathed Phyllis.

"Just we two," and Curtis' arms encircled. Phyllis tensed suddenly, and a stab of fear pierced her heart. She forgot mother. Curtis' she whispered, brushing her lips lightly across his.

"No, I've thought it all out. She and Tim can keep the apartment, and I'll engage a good reliable woman to come in every day and take charge."

"But," Phyllis remonstrated aghast, "a maid can't take my place with mother. It would take all the joy out of her life if—"

"She didn't live with us! And Tim—" she stopped, her voice thick with tears.

"You'll decide differently after you think it over," he declared. "Trust to my judgment, Phyllis."

But in this one matter she stood firm, and for days the silent battle of wills continued. Phyllis loved Curtis passionately; life without him would be an arid desert. But her mother needed her! The girl moved through the daily routine with a sense of unreality. There were faint smudges under her eyes that told of sleepless nights, but her mechanical set smile never faltered.

A week passed, torturing hours in which self-sufficient Curtis found how wholly and completely love had taken possession of him. It could no more be uprooted than could his very heart be torn from his bosom. And all this anguish was because a delicate old lady and a hardworking boy would be in the way in his new fourteen-room home.

Curtis resolutely got out of bed. He had been a fool, he realized. Snapping on the lights, he wrote a note—tore it up—tried again till one satisfied him. Then he telephoned for a messenger. "It's to be here by seven o'clock," he instructed the sleepy-voiced operator. "The letter I'm sending is of vital importance!" Then Curtis returned to bed, and slept soundly for the first time in a week.

Phyllis, too, was asleep, with tear stains on her cheeks, but peace in her heart. For earlier that night Mrs. Gregory had called her daughter. She was embarrassed and fearful, but determined. What Phyllis finally understood from her mother's rather incoherent words was this: Mrs. Gregory didn't want to live with Phyllis and Curtis! She didn't want to give up the freedom of her tiny apartment. "I hate for us to be separated, but you will have Curtis," Mrs. Gregory sobbed.

"Yes—Curtis," he-derided Phyllis half-whispered.

"Besides," Mrs. Gregory was holding her daughter's hands tightly. "I can take better care of Timmy here, and the neighbors can come in during the day and gossip a bit, as they've always done, and I'll feel—well— independent."

"Whatever will make you happiest," Phyllis managed to say.

"And," Mrs. Gregory half-laughed, shamefacedly, "Timmy and I both like to keep tootHPicks on the table!"

New York Pet Garage Profitable to Owner

There is a little place in the fifties in New York where women who come to shop on Fifth avenue or to see a play on Broadway can park their dogs.

The storage fee for an afternoon or an evening is 50 cents, and it is a dull day that doesn't find half a dozen pets parked in cages along the floor, with very businesslike tags on the doors to identify them.

Running a pet garage is so profitable, in fact, that Charles King, the proprietor, now keeps his place open until midnight for the benefit of evening patrons, although his major vocation is the daytime job of beautifying dogs and cats.

Most of the New York hotels permit visitors to check dogs and cats at the room, and during an afternoon tea and a hairdressing and manicuring and eyebrow plucking, but also of dog-cleaning cats, and administering veterinary treatment to pets which are overfat or rheumatic. The veterinary treatment costs $2.00 and the dog-cleaning process, which King says he learned from a Hindu in Paris during the war, and which spares a cat the washing which all cats hate, is administered for 85 cents.

Wonders of the Dusky Land

Carvel Wells, a British traveler and geologist, has seen many wonderful things in the course of his travels through the jungles of Africa, and other out-of-the-way spots. On his return from the Mountains of the Moon he tells among the most strange things he noted was an enormous plant with fusts so enormous that they trailed before him along the ground. At least he found his tracks the marks of four feet and, running always with them two parallel grooves which could have been made by a machine more than his fusts, the one occasion he saw a herd of giraffes and zebras which he estimated to be six miles wide and 5 miles deep. He saw them passing below him one morning and, camping at the same spot three days later, he saw them still passing.

First Stamp Primitive

The first postage stamp is said to have been used in Paris in 1625. It took the form of a receipt printed on the wrappers in which letters were sent, and was originated by a Frenchman named Velotier.

Symbol

"How's the auction business, Dan?" "The old red flag ain't what it used to be. Every time I hang it out some comrade assembles and attempts to speak."

SOUTH ALBANY

Mr. and Mrs. C. M. Fullerton were at their home here Sunday. All enjoyed the sermon preached by Rev. B. F. Wentworth on Sunday. Rev. Hilda Ives was present and assisted in the service.

Hugh Little was a business visitor in Bethel on Friday last. Round Mountain Grange will hold their meeting in the evening, July 20, followed by a "peppy lunch" and social time.

Celotex is practical, and can be used on any building job. H. I. Bean, Bethel, carries it in stock.

THE FOWLER RANGE OIL BURNER

THE FOWLER RANGE OIL BURNER has the following features, not found in other burners:

It is built for long life, the castings alone weighing approximately 20 pounds.

Has a 6 Gallon automatic tank; doing away with the small and objectionable gas tanks.

Each burner is equipped with a brass carburetor to regulate the flow. This is not used on other burners, and absolutely does away with the jets in the oil tank.

Lighted without jarring, and produces a high temperature flame very quickly.

The Fowler Range Oil Burner is built for long life. Compare its heavy castings, oil tank fittings and needle valves with any other burner on the market, and judge for yourself the great difference in durability.

Vast Wealth Amassed by Old Time Monarchs

Among those in ancient times who could afford to turn over and take another nap in the morning, one of the wealthiest was Xerxes III, according to a writer in the Detroit News. This Egyptian pharaoh some 3,000 years ago was dazzling the known world with his treasures. Distinguished estimated Xerxes' wealth at about 400,000 talents, equivalent to the purchasing power of $10,000,000,000. Croesus, the best known of all rich men, probably was not quite as wealthy as Xerxes, but he was able to give the equivalent of $200,000,000 to the Delphic Oracle as a bid for victory against the Persians. And, he added, took his defeat like a man. Croesus had a relative, Pythus, who handed Xerxes $24,000,000 one day as a token of his esteem and when Xerxes hesitated, assured him that it was a mere trifle to what he had on hand. Considering that the money would have to be multiplied by 20 to realize its purchasing power today, that was one of the largest gifts ever made.

Solomon's income was equal to $50,000,000 a year. Sardanapollus, Nero, Lucullus, the queen of Sheba and Cleopatra, if alive today, would be respected by some of our richest nabobs. Then there was William de la Pole, who, in the fourteenth century, loaned his king $5,000,000—to tide over a royal embarrassment—and never got it back.

Disappearing Gulf

However slow and imperceptible the process may be, it is a well established fact that the contour of the earth is constantly changing. Sea captains frequently note the presence of islands in mid-ocean where no islands were ever seen before and just as often note is made of the total disappearance of points of land to the sea. The peninsula of Lower California, in the western part of Mexico, is no more known, a true tongue of land following the coast line and forming the elongated part of California. Recent observations show that the land of Lower California is rising and accordingly increasing in width and at the same time the gulf is narrowing so that in the course of time the land of the peninsula may be joined to the mainland of Mexico and water now separating them will disappear entirely.

NORTH WATERFORD

Mrs. C. S. Cheever, Dorothy Moore and Mrs. Grace Elliott motored to Thomdike July 6 and spent the week end with Mrs. Fannie Erb and family. Mrs. Erb was a former resident of North Waterford.

Phenician Remains

The city of Granada is reared upon three abruptly rising hills. On the lowest of these looms up, the more really against the background of the snow capped Sierras, the "Torres Bermejas" or Vermillion towers. Much mystery surrounds these tremendous ruins. Some historians claim them to be the work of the far-coming and adventurous Phenicians.

Upon the highest hill is the Alhambra, a city in itself, once said to have housed 40,000 men.

Favorite Vegetable

Joseph was spending the day with his aunt, who is more indulgent than his mother with his capricious appetite. As his aunt was preparing to cook dinner the lad said: "Be sure and cook my favorite vegetable, auntie."

"What is it today?" asked the aunt.

"Doughnuts," was the reply.

Ford Dealers' Selling Prices

ON

USED CARS

Are Low

WHY not get a used car for the second car your family needs? Most of the cars we have accepted for trade in on new Fords have a generous number of miles in them—miles of unneeded transportation at a price you can easily afford.

Find our used car prices low because there is no "price padding" to make up for high trade-in allowances. The price of the Model A Ford is so low, and the value so high, that excessive trade-in concessions are impossible. That, and our reputation for fair-dealing, which we value so highly, protect you when you buy a used car from us.

When we offer a Model T Ford for resale it has been thoroughly reconditioned. New parts wherever needed; everything properly tightened and adjusted—and with it goes a guarantee. We have a number of these reconditioned Fords now. Also several cars of other makes, priced according to the unused transportation they offer. Let us prove our prices. Stop in today and look over these bargains.
